TRAIN ROBBERS

THE little puffer-belly chugged along on silver rails beside the river. Balls of grey wood smoke puffed from its funnel stack and rose above the rocky cliffs.

Suddenly, seven masked riders appeared as if from nowhere, scrambling their horses down the steep incline toward the track. A shot! The grinding of brakes! The locomotive, coming slowly to a halt, and then the train was swarming with masked men. Another successful train robbery by the notorious Seven Brothers was pulled.

In the mining town of Big Hope, the sheriff tilted back his chair and twirled a pair of handcuffs before speaking, "I just got a wire from Riverdale. The Seven Brothers held up another train. When the engineer didn't stop it quite fast enough to suit them, they pumped him full of lead. Those owlhoots are plumb dynamite."

"The law should protect those trains," said Foxy Williams.

The lawman stared across his desk. His lips were firmly pressed together, his eyebrows were lowered in a frown. Then his lips opened, and he gave a slow, low mirthless laugh. "The law isn't an army, and you'd need an army to stop those sidewinders."

"But there are only seven of them," protested Foxy. "Surely . . ."

"Certainly there are only seven," cut in the sheriff. "But you don't know where they're going to strike next. The law would have to put a crew of deputies on every train that's running in the west. And they'd have to be picked men. Real good men! It's not possible."

Foxy stroked his chin and looked thoughtful. He was a small man, less than medium height and rather slender. Foxy had got that front handle because he was a man of cleverness and imagination. He was famous for finding ways to succeed where others failed. He said, "Well, sheriff, I was planning to ask you for a crew of deputies to guard a train for me. I aim to ship out silver from the mine, and I don't aim to ship it straight to the Seven Brothers."

"No dice," said the sheriff. "I can't spare the men. Besides, if I did it for you, I'd have to do it for every other person who asked me. I'd sure like to help you, but that's how it is. No hard feelings?"

"No hard feelings," said Foxy, getting up and gripping the sheriff's big, brown hand. "If you can't, you can't. Besides I'll figure out something." He started for the door. He had it open when the slow-speaking lawman called, "If I were you, I'd hire Bull's-eye Derring to guard the stuff. He's in town. Over at the Cattleman's House. He's better than seven deputies, anyway."

It was days later. Foxy, himself, was at the throttle as the locomotive hauling the silver chugged easily along on the flat stretch between the river and the cliffs. Opposite Foxy, peering out of the cab through a telescope, was a bronzed six-footer whose hard muscles bulged his checkered shirt. Foxy grumbled, "We'd be making better time if you hadn't insisted on hitching up that logging car, Bull's-eye. That big chain is a heavy load all by itself."

"True," said Bull's-eye.

"Well, let's uncouple it and . . ."

A shot interrupted. A slug splattered against the side of the iron horse. Then Foxy saw them—seven masked men, scrambling their horses down the steep cliffside, scattering loose pebbles and shale as they came. "Stop the train!" ordered one of the bandits.

Foxy was excited, but not nervous. As he calmly swung an iron shutter into place across the cab window he called to Bull's-eye, "Put up your shutter. Here they are. Fireman, throw plenty of wood in the firebox. We're putting on steam! The throttle's going to be wide open! We're going to see if those ornery Seven Brothers can storm this fort! This rolling fort!"

With the shield-like shutters in place, the locomotive cab did become a small fort. Bullets rained against the metal, but instead of obeying the robbers' order to stop, the train picked up speed. Through a slit in the armor, Bull's-eye fired his Colt .45 and managed to wing two of the bandits before they gave up and fled back up the rocky trail.

The whole flurry was over in a few minutes. Foxy was chuckling as he opened one of the shutters. "I reckon I really outsmarted the Seven Brothers. It was real brainy of me to fix up this engine like a fort. And to put the silver in a car that had the safe. I reckon our cargo's out of danger now."

"It is," agreed Bull's-eye.

"You bet it is," chuckled Foxy.

"Till they come back," drawled Bull's-eye.

The train was puffing up a slight grade, heading from the open plains toward a forest. Bull's-eye was still sweeping the landscape with his telescope. Foxy said, "Relax, can't you? We've demoralized the Seven Brothers. Won't be any more trouble from them."

"Listen!" said Bull's-eye.

"Listen?" Foxy looked puzzled. "I can't hear anything but this wheezing fort-on-wheels. What do you hear?"

"An axe," responded Bull's-eye. "Somebody up ahead is swinging an axe."

"What of it? Just some lumbermen at work and . . ."

The train had entered the forest. Up ahead a tree came crashing down, across the rails. Three masked gunmen stood beside the fallen tree. With an oath, Foxy put on the brakes. The train ground to a halt, its cowcatcher just nudging the bark. Once again the shield shutters were whipped into place, and once more Bull's-eye kept the robbers at a distance with his accurate fire.

"The fools!" fumed Foxy. "This isn't going to get them anywhere. They can't break in here. They can't get at the silver."

"But we're trapped," said Bull's-eye.

Foxy's eyes lighted up. "No we're not. This thing goes in reverse. We'll just back up, return to the mine, get a gang of workmen and . . ."

Once more he was interrupted. This time there was a crash from behind. He looked back and groaned. A hundred yards behind the silver train another tree had been felled across the tracks. "We are trapped!" moaned Foxy. "Well, it won't do them any good. They still can't get the silver."

The masked men were carefully keeping out of range of Bull's-eye's guns. Four others joined the three who had been standing near the first fallen tree. They seemed to confer. Then they rode off into the woods. "They're gone!" said Foxy. "Let's go out and see if we can pull that tree off the track."

"Sit tight!" commanded Bull's-eye. "That's what they want. Soon as you showed your head they'd shoot it off. Besides, we can't move that tree with our bare hands. Sit tight."

"But what are they doing? Why did they go away?"

"They'll wait out of sight till dark, then they'll come back and smoke us out," said Bull's-eye. "They'll build a fire under us."

Foxy frowned. "I'll have to think of something."

"I've already thought of something," said Bull's-eye. "You sit tight till dark, then do what I tell you. We'll have a fighting chance."

Just past sunset, when the evening was gray, Bull's-eye slipped from the cab on the river side. Soon he had the log chain hooked to the tree. He gave a low whistle. "Whip-poo-will!"

Foxy heard the signal. He started backing the locomotive, slowly. The chain tightened, tugged. The big tree began to slide. Huffing and puffing, the locomotive pulled it, till the trunk was edgewise along the track, but off the rails. Bull's-eye unhooked the chain from the locomotive and yelled, "Full speed ahead!" just as he heard the hoofs and shouts coming up from the woods.

THE engine chugged forward, scraping the big tree, cracking off branches, but plowing ahead. In desperation, the Seven Brothers triggered a fusilade of shots at the fleeing train. One of the masked men spurred his horse, leaped to the logging car, and climbed aboard. Bull's-eye, who had caught the same car from the opposite side a moment before, kayoed him with one blow. The man sprawled unconscious on the flatcar. "When he comes to, he'll either tell us where his brothers' hide-out is, or he'll hang for murder. I think he'll tell us," thought Bull's-eye. All the while he was popping his pistol at the receding Six Brothers, while the train sped on into the night and out of the forest.

In the locomotive cab, Foxy was muttering, "I should change my name. Bull's-eye is the real foxy one! He saved my silver."

"He sure is," said the fireman.
